KILLED FOR "SORCERER."

Superstition was responsible for a terrible crime committed recently among Hungarian peasants at Lausenburg. A young farmer named Maris of Masel murdered an old man of the village, named Heyte, with a hatchet, and then surrendered to the police. He declared that he had killed Heyte because the latter was a sorcerer, and had been paid by his cousins, who recently lost a lawsuit against him, to do him bodily harm. Another reputed wizard in the village had revealed to Maris that the epileptic fits from which he suffered felt justified in killing him.

LARGE SUM LONG UNFOUND.

Strange was the discovery made recently by the owner of a property situated in the neighborhood of Pau, France, when, as he was trimming a hedge by the railway, he picked up a big pocketbook, which he found to contain scrip of the value of $41,000. On making inquiries, he ascertained that the owner was a crazy individual, who, on his way from another town, had thrown the pocketbook out of a window of the carriage in which he was seated, and had finally been taken into custody at Pau Station. The madman's pocketbook had lain in the hedge for more than a year.

PROPOSED SCHOOL "SHIFTS."

A proposal to work two "shifts" daily of teachers and scholars in the elementary schools has been approved by the Nottingham (Eng.) city council. It is suggested that the first batch of children should commence at eight o'clock and work till one, the second batch going on from one o'clock till five. The only way to stop the tremendous growth of capital expenditure is to use existing schools to better advantage, say the promoters of this plan.

THE SUBSTITUTE

By Francois Coppes

When Savinlen began to ask about Paris, Jean Francois shook his head Savinten to remain the simple runtic over his shoulder and a bundle on the and going to mass every Sunday. Jean Francois loved him for his plety, for his candor, for his bonesty, for were Heyte's work, and therefore he all that he himself had lost, and so long ago. He made himself a father to Savinien.

Besides, he was afraid that Savinien would learn something of his past. It was not that he feared being denounced for an escaped convict, and taken back to serve out his time; but now that the new life had begun, of which he had vaguely dreamed even amidat the career of delinquency and petty pieces of gold. crime that had been his since his tenth year-now that he was an honest workman, he did not want to think of the past. Sometimes there escaped from him some bit of thieves' slangand be felt the pain of an old wound reopened; especially since he fancied that he saw in Savinien the awakening of an unhealthy curiosity. Jean Francois was uneasy about his friend.

foundation. Savinien could not long remain the simple rustic that he was on his arrival in Paris. If the gross and noisy pleasures of the wine shop always repelled him, he was profoundly troubled by other temptations, full of danger for the inexperience of his twenty years. When spring came he began to go off alone, and at first he wandered about the brilliant entrance of some dancing hall, watching the you wish, but leave us alone." young girls who went in with their arms around each other's waists, talking in low tones. Then, one evening, when lilacs perfumed the air and the call to quadrilles was most captivating, he crossed the threshold, and from that time Jean Francois observ ed a change, little by little, in his manners and his visage. He became more frivolous, more extravagant. He often borrowed from his friend his scanty savings, and he forgot to repay. Jean Francois, feeling that he was abandoned, jealous and forgiving at the same time, suffered and was silent. He felt that he had no right to reproach him, but with the foresight of affection he indulged in cruel and inevitable presentiments.

One evening, as he was mounting the stairs to his room, absorbed in his thoughts, he heard, as he was about to enter, the sound of angry voices, and he recognized that of the old Auvergnat who lodged with Savinien and himself. An old habit of suspicion made him stop at the landing place and listen to learn the cause of the trouble.

"Yes," said the Auvergnat, angrily, "I am sure that some one has opened my trunk and stolen from it the three louis that I had hidden in a little box; and he who has done this thing must be one of the two companions who sleep here, if it were not the servant Maria. It concerns you as much as it does me, since you are the master of the house, and I will drag you to the courts if you do not let me at once break open the vallses of the two masons. My poor gold! It was here yesterday to its place, and I will tell you just what it was, so that if we find it again nobody can accuse me of having lied. Ah, I know them, my three beautiful gold pieces, and I can see them as plainly as I see you! One plece was more worn than the others; was a great old fellow with a queue had on it a Philippe with whiskers, I had marked with my teeth. They don't trick me. Do you know that I will call the police! Hurry up!"

He wanted the Napoleon, the man with a queue, and the Philippe that I have bitten he had been-the little peasant who See the dents! Ah, the little beggar had to come to Paris with his stick with the sanctified air. I should have much mooner suspected the other. Ah, and of it, shunning the wine shops the wretch! Well, he must go to the convict prison."

"Enough of this," he said, in a thick voice; "I took the money, and put it in my comrade's trunk. But that is too bad. I am a thief, but not a Judas, Call the police; I will not try to escape, only I must say a word to Savinien in private. Here he is."

"Keep quiet." Then turning toward the others:

"Leave me alone with him. I tell you I won't go away. Lock us in if With a commanding gesture showed them the door.

They went out. Savinien, broken by grief, was sitting on the bed, and lowered his eyes without understanding anything.

"Listen," said Jean Francois, who came and took him by the hands. "I understand! You have stolen three gold pieces to buy some trifle for a girl. That costs six months in prison. But one only comes out from there to go back again, and you will become a pillar of police courts and tribunals, I understand it. I have been seven years at the reform school, a year at Sainte Pelagie, three years at Poissy, five years at Toulon. Now, don't be afraid. Everything is arranged. have taken it on my shoulders."

"It is dreadful!" said Savinien; but hope was springing up again in his cowardly heart.

"When the elder brother is under would have taken me again one of these days, for I am a runaway from exile. And then, do you see, that life will be less hard for me than for you. I know it all, and I shall not complain if I have not done you this service for nothing, and if you swear to me that you will never do it again. Savinien, I have loved you well, and your friendship has made me happy. It is through it that, since I have known you, I have been honest and pure, as I might always have been, perhaps, if I had had, like you, a father to put a tool in my hands, a mother to teach me my prayers. It was my sole regret that I was useless to you, and that I deceived you concerning myself. Today I have unmasked in saving you. It is all right. Do not cry, and embrace me, for already I hear heavy boots on the stairs. They are coming with the posse, and we must not seem to know each other so well before

It was the landlord and the Auvergnat, who brought the police. Jean Francois sprang forward to the landing place, held out his hands for the handcuffs, and said, laughing, "Forward, bad lot!"

Today he is at Cayenne, condemned for life as an incorrigible.

Handy Fire Buckets.

The big department and business houses where many people are employed are constantly on the lookout for the new devices that are handy in the emergency of a rapid blaze and there is scarcely one of these places that hasn't its equipment of extinguishers, axes and hose reels,

"One of the most interesting appliances," says "Architecture and Buildiug," "is a fire bucket tank, designed to hold six fire buckets with patented, self-raising handles, each bucket filling into the other on the nesting principle, lugs being provided to prevent the buckets from binding or sticking together. In case of fire they may be withdrawn and filled with chemical solution. Enough solution is in the tank to fill each bucket, as the one set into it is withdrawn, and thus without dirt or outside interference a constant supply of six fire buckets of solution may be kept on hand."

Thirty-two of these tanks were recently installed in the building of one of the big dry goods companies.
